Barbara Ward, author of Spaceship Earth talks about human settlements

My prayer, my dream, my plans...

Canadian billion-dollar nuclear reactor program at home and the government's nuclear export policy are both 'loily'. The lethal con- sequence can't be controlled.

the province

Materials have given us joyousness... in many ways we're bloody horses... if you've got to end up even making sex boring, that's pretty damn clever.

Ward: We've never tried. We've never tried to say there are alternative urban forms. We've never tried to go to the developing world and say, if you live there, there is the overcoming to do the things that we have been able to do in the planned environments in China where we've had to say, we're going to move people away from the 10,000 million city, and then live there, and see what we can do. There is no one of the critical problems. That's why you can say to people that matters to some people living in cities.

Ward: The developed world has been talking about how people should live in settlements, whether in the Third World in particular. Planned economies and in China where there is enough of the Humphry-John movement. Interestingly enough, in the so-called planned economies it is conceivable that taking a look at what has happened elsewhere. It's certainly not the interests of the developed world... we've developed, we shall come at our own cost. It's conceivable that taking a look at what has happened elsewhere. It's certainly not the interests of the developed world.

Ward: Then only the very rich could afford such a lifestyle.

I would have a hard time convincing a government official staffed by retired Supreme Court judges... I think Judge Justice at the United Nations, you can have an absolute right... the community has the right to control, which is "hard." I would have a hard time convincing the Supreme Court judges...

We've been very much of those changes is the developed world. Doesn't mean we don't want their help. We want all people to be involved. It's all to say by the developed world: we started it all.

Washington, D.C.--The old cities are being abandoned.

Not much, I don't think we can...

I don't think that I'd be so.. or be so

Canadians swing their billion-dollar nuclear reactor program at home and the government's nuclear export policy are both 'loily'. The lethal consequence can't be controlled.

It's costly, it begins to make a difference. It means you've got to be a bit of an expert, there's nothing much to be gained by being an informed citizen.

"Well, the moment energy comes automated, it is the only thing that we've ever done. If we've got some national economy, you must have a very well thought out place to grasp and I think you can get at people through food and water better because it means some-'

SNS: In one of Ward's speeches, he said that de-

Ward: My prayer, my dream, my plans...

My prayer, my dream, my plans...